The proceedings are to be notable not only only on account of the intensely remarkable crime to which they relate, but also because because of the great number of persons who are probably to testify and of the great variety of evidence to be introduced.

The interest in the case has grown steadily since poor Benwell's body was found in the swampy woods, six miles from this place, last February; and so marked has it become in this section that even if the town hall, where the trial begins to-day, were of several times it achial capacity it could not accommodate the throng of would-be spectators.

It has been wisely decided, therefore, to limit the attendance to those whose presence is, in one way or another, necessary.

The crime for which Birchall is to be tried is one the circumstances of which were such
